1. Choosing of the Bride.....Konstantin Makovski.

This grand painting from the brush of the great Russian master who also painted the Russian Wedding Feast which was shown in the museum last season, takes for its subject the following story:

THE STORY OF THE PICTURE.

In the year of 1645, Alex. Michailowitsch then sixteen years old was declared Czar of Russia. Two years later, when he was eighteen years of age, according to the ancient custom, emissaries were sent throughout the Empire inviting the fairest maidens of the nobility to Moscow. From the two hundred maidens thus gathered together, six of the fairest were selected for presentation to the young Czar, from which number he was to select his bride. The young man, however, did not wish to make his choice during such a formal ceremony, and so arranged to have a private concert at the palace at which the six maidens were to be present. He took a place among the musicians where he could watch the company unrecognized.

Among the young ladies invited was Eufemia from the province Rjazan. While the musicians were playing a sweet national tune peculiar to her own province, Eufemia looking up encountered the ardent gaze of the supposed musician, but in reality the young Czar himself. Indignant she tried to turn away but her eyes disobeyed her will. The young Czar was handsome and his eyes told a story more eloquent than his lips might have uttered. She, of course, had no idea that she would ever again meet the handsome young musician; but, in any event, she refused next day to be presented to the Czar. Her parents entreated her to attend least they should incur the royal displeasure. She finally consented to go but resolved in her mind that if the Czar's choice fell upon her, she would beg him on bended knees to select another. Arriving at the throne-room, she timidly took her place in the rear.

The Czar's favorite officer Morosoff, sat near the throne and arranged that his sister Marie should be the first maiden in line nearest the young Czar. Morosoff presented the Czar with a ring and a handkerchief on a salver whispering excitedly, "There is Marie, the one directly before you." The Czar, however, took no notice of his words but over-looking the foremost maidens endeavored to seek out the one on whom his heart had already been set. At that moment Eufemia who had taken no interest in the ceremony raised her eyes, and to her astonishment discovered in the person of the Czar the handsome young musician of the day before. This is the point of the story illustrated in the painting. Thereupon the young Czar approached the trembling and confused Eufemia and taking her by the hand, introduced her to the assembled company as his future bride.
